1. Defining Diversity – a wide definition (including race, ethnicity, gender, religion, language, disability, geography (ie rural), as well as factors now obtaining such as HIV status) is necessary so as to not to confine the issue to simply one of race or gender. Also a wide definition allows for local particularities to be paid attention to.
2. The attitude to Diversity – needs to one of possibility and openness to enrichment rather than seeing the issue as a “problem” to be solved. Also diversity in the north is often seen as a “minority” issue, but in the south it can often be a situation involving a “majority”. Certainly on a global scale majorities (ie the global poor) are disregarded in mainstream journalism and its texts.
3. The political reality – differences are not equal, dealing with diversity is also to deal realistically with inequality and structural change.
4. The levels of attention needed:
 - Staff and students – depending on where we are situated we have different amounts of control and power about how to affect the composition of staff and student bodies. However, a diverse staff and diversity in students is an absolutely necessary component of engaging in diversity in journalism education. The challenge in classrooms is then to allow those who are different from the previous homogeneous situation to have voice and say and what transpires. This is not about incorporation into the status quo, but about change, growth and learning.
 - Curriculum is definitely within the control of journalism educators.
 1. Both What and How we teach is critical to embedding diversity in the curriculum. This involves thought and input about content of courses, activities undertaken and the various efforts to expose students to diverse people, languages, cultures and situations.
 2. Languages should be highlighted as particular vehicles not just to create fluency and functionality in journalism practice but as means to engage with cultures beyond the homogeneous.
 3. We should be alert to resistances and blindnesses within classes and have strategies for how to deal critically with both these situations.
 4. Universities are unique environments for critique and debate and we should lean on this feature.
 5. Journalism itself as a practice is implicated in the perpetuation of inequality and we should therefore expose students to types of journalism that engage with different ways of doing journalism and other journalistic paradigms – subaltern journalism, culture journalism, development journalism, citizen journalism, public journalism etc
 - Capacity building and skills for educators and students in order to address the issue of diversity is critical within tertiary institutions.

- Mainstream media institutions and the texts they produce – we have less power over the production of texts and the way they are produced than over curriculum but the syndicate felt that engagement wherever possible with editors, managers and journalists working in mainstream media in order to engage them in these questions was a very necessary task.

5. The aim in taking diversity seriously is ultimately to shift the knowledge base on which journalism as a practice rests and to shift journalism practice itself.
